Master's Programs

The School of Education offers six master's degree programs. In all of our master's programs, students are able to select a concentration to narrow their studies toward an area they find valuable to their careers and work. Many of our programs can be completed part-time or full-time, and some have the option to complete on-campus or 100% online. The graduate programs in the School of Education are flexible to meet the needs of working professionals or full-time graduate students. Most of our programs can be completed within one year of full-time study.

Our degrees include course work in the field of instructional design and technology, curriculum and instruction, higher education administration, to name a few. You will learn to generate, use, and critically examine research that you can use to teach in the classroom, obtain a leadership position, or change and facilitate current policies, methods, and practices in the educational industry.

Doctoral Programs

The School of Education offers an EdD in Urban Educational Leadership and a PhD in Educational Studies with several program concentrations to choose from.

Our goal is to ensure that all of our graduates share joint, rigorous training to prepare them for the rapidly growing opportunities in the education field. During this program, students are able to conduct their dissertation research and develop their expertise consistent with their unique interests.

A detailed overview of all our graduate offerings can be found on the back page.
